Comment text:

Year after year, Bristol City Council's answer to increasing costs is to increase tax and reduce services, while failing to cope with the overwhelming pressure of social care (housing, adult and child care etc). Meanwhile, anyone who travels around Bristol would think the lack of planning and foresight truly bewildering and totally unfair. Do we really need the extra cost of more councillors? Will it improve the quality of life or simply add to the misery? I'm trying not to be cynical, but additional changes to boundaries smacks of gerrymandering, especially in the current polarising sociopolitical climate.
